Student Government: Important Work

Student Government Is Big Business

Editor's Note: One of the highlights for Homecoming next fall will be a reunion of former presidents of the Stout Student Association. Names are being researched and individuals are being contacted. An overview of the Stout Student Association, its past and its present, is summarized in the following article.

Student government at colleges and universities is frequently characterized as being caught up in planning parties and social gatherings or bogged down with weighty, political controversies. Neither description comes close to depicting the Stout Student Association, the University's primary student governing body.

With a long tradition of strength and leadership, student government at Stout is big business run by serious and dedicated young men and women.

That statement could be supported merely by the size of the more than quarter million dollar budget the SSA administers. Yet, student government extends beyond mere financial matters to the heart of the management structure for the University.

Though greater student involvement is often thought to be a product of the 60's and early 70's, at Stout, progressively larger student responsibility can be traced back more than a half century. History is not clear about the exact age of student government at Stout, but records tend to show that the first organization was chartered in the early 1920's. Admittedly, student power at that time was miniscule by today's standards. However, early involvement by students in at least some aspects of managing their own affairs has formed the foundation for a model system of student government that has had a major impact in shaping the character of the University.

Jim Bowen, administrative director for United Council, the UW System-wide student government body, said that student government at Stout carries back to the days when the University was part of the old Wisconsin State University System. Those universities tended to have strong student governments. "Stout is a good example of what perhaps nine or ten of the thirteen (universities in the UW System) are attempting to do in student government," Bowen said. "Stout is more or less what student government in Wisconsin is trying to do today."

State law, which forms the present University of Wisconsin System, provides specific statutory power for student government organizations. For example, students have primary responsibility in forming policies concerning student life, services and interests. Students on each campus have a right to determine how they are to organize and have major control of student activity fees. The law qualifies these powers as being "subject to the responsibilities and powers of the board (of Regents), the president (of the System), the chancellor (of the institution) and faculty." But the net effort of the legislation gives students a considerable voice in institutional management. Wisconsin is actually the first state to go this far in legally delineating student authority at its public universities.

What this means at Stout is that students administer a $300,000 annual activities budget, which goes to such far ranging things as sports, entertainment, speakers, the student newspaper and the campus radio station. In addition, student representatives sit on dozens of major University committees, commissions and other influential groups. The SSA president is an ex-officio member of the Chancellor's Council, one of the top administrative bodies on campus.

Representation on the SSA is drawn from throughout the student body. Each residence hall has one senator; Greek organizations and graduate students are represented; there are on-campus senators and senators at large.

Student governments in the former Wisconsin State University System were influential in having student authority included in the merger law. For some university administrators, this amount of shared authority with students has been a source of irritation. A few officials at other universities have made subtle attempts to resist it. Not so at Stout. Here the idea has been welcomed, encouraged and expanded beyond the statutory requirements. While students may benefit from this expanded role in university governance, it has actually done much to improve the operation of the entire University.

Sam Wood, Dean of Students, explained that it is desirable for the institution to involve students in the decision-making process. "If anyone thinks that a university can function with all the decisions being made by one group of people, then there are some faults in their reasoning," he said. "To be effective, you have to give everybody the opportunity to participate in decision making." Although the University administration still retains the legal authority for nearly all final decisions, involving students in the process makes those decisions more effective. "The fact that students can participate prior to the decision is a very significant part of it," Wood said. "The fact that student opinion is sought, makes students feel a part of the University."

Chancellor Robert S. Swanson agrees. "The more people you can involve in your operation, the stronger it is going to be, if there is some direction to it," he said. "When student government has planned something, set the policy and carried it out, they obviously are going to make every effort to see that it works."

Dave Conn, the current SSA president, says the organization focuses on specific issues and concentrates efforts in the areas that can be most effective. "The nature of student government here at Stout is that we don't get caught up in peripheral issues or run off simply on one issue," he said. "But the big issue is education, that's what we are trying to improve. We are concerned about education, not only in the classroom because education in the classroom is affected by so many outside things. The politics of a university affect the curriculum of the university, so we are concerned with education, but we also realize that there are so many factors that affect it."

Conn said that students have discovered that through perseverance and patience, things really can be accomplished. "I like to call it the treadmill affect," he said. "It's a continual effort. I really believe in the system and I believe that it works."

The numerous recent achievements of student government illustrate Conn's feelings. They range from such simple things as setting up a free duplicating service in the Student Center to major responsibility of recommending names for appointments to University committees. Students have set up their own course in leadership in which participants earn academic credit while learning leadership roles. The Board of Academic Affairs gives students a greater say about the educational offerings of the University. Better management of activity fees has resulted from improvement in the University Activities Board. Students have set up a landlord/tenant union in which both renters and property owners can define their responsibilities and voice their concerns. Using local attorneys as volunteers, the student government offers a free legal referral service.

One long-standing self-defined role of student government has been to promote a sense of "community" within the University as well as the city. To promote this, all University employees are now eligible to vote in student elections.

Students also feel a responsibility for creating a favorable image of Stout. "We believe that we have an obligation or responsibilities to promote the University," Conn said. "If we didn't believe in the University, most of us wouldn't be here."

Scott Cabot, immediate past SSA president, expresses similar feelings. "Our philosophy here is different from other campuses," he said. "I think (student government) should be a promoter of the University. A lot of us are in student government because we believe in the University; we want to improve it." Cabot said that in some respects student government has a "watch dog" role to play. "You have to be a sort of independent force, but you have to be part of the system," he said.

Another way student government has exerted its influence is through recently expanded lobbying efforts in the state legislature. "It has always been a problem of whether to lobby for the social issues as opposed to pure educational issues," Cabot said. "We've stuck mainly with educational issues but have jumped into social issues if they affect students." Some of the legislation for which students have lobbied deals with tuition, landlord/tenant rights, collective bargaining for faculty, the drinking age, and the decriminalization of marijuana. “Actually, I think all of this is another example of our desire to work within the system,” Cabot said.

Many of the people interviewed for this article spoke of student government at Stout as “the best in the UW System.” That obviously biased viewpoint gains some credence from the fact that in 1977, student government at Stout became the first recipient of the John C. Weaver Award for Outstanding Participation in Shared Governance.

Swanson

“We regarded ourselves as part and parcel of the University”

Undoubtedly, there are many factors that have helped shape the organization into what it is today. Perhaps no one had more impact than did the late Merle Price, who served as Dean of Students from 1929 until his retirement in 1971. Price’s careful guidance and patient leadership in the growth of the organization has surely had a lasting impact on the University. “Students are more aware of students’ needs than anybody else,” Price once said. “By and large if students are given the responsibility, they will accept it.”

William J. Micheels, former chancellor and president at Stout, holds considerable responsibility for promoting a more direct involvement of students in the management of the institution.

“Students are reasonable when treated reasonably,” Micheels once said at a student gathering in which he called for “meaningful participation.” He said that all groups in the University — faculty, students and administration — must be heard and must share in policy formation. “If we can build on the concept of meaningful participation, we can engender a climate in which useful criticism will be accepted and acted upon by administrators, faculty and students,” he said. “Each group has rights and each group has responsibilities.” “The exceptions one can point out are simply that — exceptions,” he said.

When Swanson became chancellor in 1972, he continued and expanded philosophy that Micheels expressed. As a student, Swanson was president of the SSA in 1949 and over the years as faculty member and administrator in various areas, he has continued to maintain close contact with students.

Guy Salyer, who was an advisor to the organization for some 25 years, until retirement in 1975, said student government has been most active in the past 15 or 20 years. “It’s a tendency all over the country for democracy in action,” he said. “The students think they ought to have responsibility. They are learning by taking on responsibility.” Salyer added that he views student government as training for the future. “It’s training for citizenship, understanding problems, diagnosing problems, going into those problems and coming up with solutions,” he said.

The degrees of authority and levels of sophistication for student government at Stout have gradually risen over the years. At least some of the changes reflect more liberal viewpoints of society in general.

George Decker, who was SSA president in 1928, recalls that student government had “practically no voice” back then. “The word came down from the president to the dean and the dean to the faculty,” he said. “As students, we didn’t dare make odd moves or we were out. There were no big issues back then. It was pretty straight. We weren’t interested in social movements that developed in later years.”

Elmer Clausen, SSA president in 1939, said things had not changed that much by the time he was elected. “We had so little power that I can’t even really remember it,” he said. “I had a lot more power as editor of the Stoutonia than I did as student body president.” Clausen admitted that he likes to imagine what it would be like to be an SSA president today. “It would have been fun to have been president now,” he said. “It would be much more meaningful.”

World War II may have caused one of the most dramatic changes in how student government operates. Returning veterans who were older and more mature, wanted greater control of their own affairs. “Before the war (student government) was more social,” recalled Frank Dummann, SSA president in 1946. “The push came after the war. Students wanted a say in things. They didn’t want things crammed down their throat. It wasn’t a clamour for power but a demand for more rights.” He explained that veterans were unwilling to tolerate many of the old, restrictive rules of the institution. “These vets wanted some of the rules changes to meet their more adult behavior patterns,” Dummann said. “Here they were over in Europe and dodging bullets and then they were back in college and being told what they had to do.”

Swanson recalled that by 1949, students began to feel more of a partnership with the University. “We regarded ourselves as part and parcel of the University; we were never in opposition to the faculty or administration," he said. "I guess we always figured that the faculty and administration were really in charge of the place and we were the students. But we had a lot of freedom to do things, too, and to promote ideas."

Helmuth Albrecht, who was student body president in 1959, said students then were less vocal. "This is partially because we weren't as aware of what was happening," Albrecht said. "But, I always felt that there was an opportunity to step forward, although not nearly as much as there is today."

There is certainly no way of knowing where student government will be at the end of its next 50 years of operation. But, there is good reason to believe that it will continue to occupy an important place at Stout. "Its role has varied over the years," Cabot said. "It's constantly changing to meet the needs of the times and the conditions of the times."

Students Join Chamber of Commerce

The student body at Stout has joined the Chamber of Commerce. By a unanimous vote in the Student Senate, the University's 7,000 students are now official members of the Menomonee Area Chamber of Commerce.

Pete Ptacek, vice president for legislative affairs in the Stout Student Association, said the move is a logical one. "I personally don't think it is that unusual," he said. "I think it is something that should have been done a long time ago."

Ptacek

Weingart

Jim Weingart, executive director of the Chamber of Commerce, said that when the idea was first proposed to him he was "surprised and shocked." But Weingart was quick to endorse the plan. "My reaction is one of pure delight," he said. "It is a delight to have students concerned enough about the town to become this involved."

Weingart acknowledged that this may reflect an overall positive change in attitude by students toward business. However, he sees it as a "natural" for the Stout student body, where many of the students are enrolled in majors designed to prepare them for careers in business and industry. "Most students coming here have definite goals in life," Weingart said. "They know what they want to do and appear to be a lot more serious minded; and, therefore, better able to relate to the business community."

Kevin Wanecke, former media and advertising coordinator for the Student Senate, said that after Weingart explained the Chamber of Commerce program to the Student Senate, it passed easily with a 27 to 0 vote. The $75 membership fee comes from student activity funds, which are controlled by the Senate. Dave Conn, Senate president, is the official voting member of the Chamber, although all students may participate in Chamber activities. "The Stout Student Association represents the student body," Ptacek said. "The decisions we make are for the majority of the students. We joined the organization because we felt it would be in the best interest of all students."

Ptacek pointed out that Stout was the largest industry and employer in Menomonee. "It was only practical to do this," he said. "We have a big impact on the city."

Ptacek and Wanecke agree that reaction from the students has been positive. The two maintain that membership provides mutual benefits to both the student body and the Chamber. "This can help merchants understand how students feel about them," Wanecke said. "We do add a lot to their business." Ptacek added that it is also a good investment for the students. "The Chamber of Commerce has many activities that we had not previously heard about," he said. "This keeps us better informed." He added that it may provide students with opportunities for work experience, something they will need to help them land jobs after graduation.

Ptacek hopes to work with the Chamber's legislative committee and to do some joint lobbying on certain issues. "We won't always agree but at least we'll have input," he said. "In return, area businessmen will get a viewpoint they never had before. We will be talking to them from the other side of the counter."

Ptacek also hopes that the affiliation with the Chamber will give students a better picture of the free enterprise system. "We are all going to belong to the system eventually, so we might as well get involved now," he said.

Printing: Part of Modern Living

The Graphic Arts Department at Stout and the Stout Typographical Society stress the importance of printing to everyday life.

From newspapers to books, road signs to watch dials, cereal boxes to wallpaper and Christmas cards, the scope of graphic communications almost defies limitations, according to department spokesmen. Before an item reaches the printing press, a number of persons are involved in its development, including commercial artists, copywriters, photographers, photo typesetters, litho artists, camera operators, strippers, platemakers, photo engravers, bindery personnel, sales representatives, estimators and production managers.

The sophisticated science of electronics also appears in printing, with computerized word processing and photo typesetting, quality control and cost analysis.

Even chemists derive jobs from printing: new inks are being made to improve the finished printed product.

Throughout the year, Stout Typographical Society students attempt to finance a special three-day spring field trip and special library books by producing printed products for campus organizations.

They print student resumes, promotional buttons and t-shirts for dormitory residents, and this year did job work for the Wisconsin Early Childhood Association, Wisconsin Industrial Education Association, Corner III menus and the full color reproduction of the game, "Monotony," produced by the Stout Manufacturing Laboratory.

Course work for industrial technology or industrial education majors who concentrate in graphic arts, includes theory and lab practices in nine major areas of graphic arts. Some of the courses are introductory graphic arts, typography, composition, line and half-tone photography, image transfer, general binding and finishing, printing economics, graphic arts production techniques and color separation.
